Kermit J. Lind is Clinical Professor of Law Emeritus at Cleveland-Marshall College of Law, Cleveland State University, where supervised a teaching law practice providing legal services to neighborhood housing and community development corporations. Besides teaching skills to new lawyers, the law clinic played a leading role in the region's struggle against residential neighborhood destabilization in the mortgage crisis. Prof. Lind was co-counsel in two civil suits filed in 2008 to require that global banks owning hundreds of homes in Cleveland abate public nuisance conditions in the houses they own, as required by state and local laws. He provides an array of Continuing Legal Education courses for lawyers. Prof. Lind's most recent law review publications are: "Collateral Matters: Housing Code Compliance in the Mortgage Crisis," 32 Northern Illinois University Law Review 445 (2012) "Responding to the Mortgage Crisis: Three Cleveland Examples," 44 The Urban Lawyer, 1 (2012), Can Public Nuisance Law Protect Your Neighborhood From Big Banks," XLIV Suffolk University Law Review 89 (2011) explores the application of nuisance law theory to the local impact of the mortgage crisis. A recent article in the Fall 2011 issue of Shelterforce describes the work of the Cleveland Municipal Housing Court enforcing housing and building codes in the mortgage crisis. Currently Prof. Lind consults with public and public interest agencies on community development law and public policy.
